A group of 40 young people from all over Europe are about to gather at the "Zentrum für Erwachsenenbildung Stephansstift". From August 14th - 26th they will debate the issue of "political representation" as seen in an EU-context.

The aim of the Representations Community College (RCC) is to let Europeans debate how to bridge the gap between those being represented and those who are representing in the EUropean political institutions.

Simulation games, presentations, contributions by external lecturers as well as the participants themselves make up the mixture of formal, non-formal and informal learning methods which will be used.

The young participants are asked to create a production before they leave - an ethics codex to be used by European parliamentarians. It will be forwarded to politicians, opinion-makers and media all over Europe in order to create further awareness of EUropean political matters and the composite democracy that is the EU today.

It is not just the result the organizers want to promote by organizing the RCC, but also the process. It is no coincidence that the issues are going to be debated among Europeans instead of among nationals. "We believe the small-scale European public sphere we are establishing by letting Europeans learn and live together here at Stephansstift could and should become a model for learning in a future EU," explains organizer Erik Jengtes. "It is our ambition that some time in the future every European will have the chance to try what these young people are now trying: learning and living together for some time with people from all over Europe."

Previously the ACC has released the "Act on European Community Colleges" and concrete proposals for supporting measures within the EU. These proposals are now reflected in the EU-Commission's vice-president Margot Wallström's so-called Plan D, released after the Dutch and French referenda.

"Even if we have been proving our ideas by putting them into practice for many years now, and even if the ideas have been taken up by the EU-Commission, we believe there is still a need to create more concrete examples of how to make the EU work, more learning communities, many more events and small scale European public spheres within which European citizens have the chance to form common points of view. Many small streams make the river," says organizer Anna Littke.
